Background and Context of A Civil Action

A Civil Action by Jonathan Harr is rooted in a true story that unfolded in the 1980s, focusing on the environmental contamination of Woburn, Massachusetts. The book details a lawsuit filed by families who alleged that industrial pollution had led to a cluster of leukemia cases among their children. This section examines the historical and environmental context that frames the narrative, providing readers with essential background information.

Environmental Issues in Woburn

Woburn's water supply became the center of controversy after investigations revealed hazardous chemicals, including trichloroethylene (TCE) and perchloroethylene (PCE), in the groundwater. These chemicals were linked to industrial waste disposal practices by companies such as W.R. Grace and Beatrice Foods. The contamination raised public health concerns and prompted legal action, which became the focus of Harr's exhaustive research and writing.

Legal Landscape in the 1980s

The lawsuit depicted in a civil action by jonathan harr took place during a period when environmental law was evolving, and public awareness of industrial pollution was rising. The case highlighted the challenges plaintiffs faced in proving corporate liability and navigating complex tort law. It also underscored the limitations of legal remedies in environmental contamination cases.
